Read these descriptions aloud. No copy of either artist's work is supplied. Use a general method to make your own response.

Henri Matisse Cut-outs Later career

Henri Matisse made paintings and later developed cut-outs as artworks in their own right. Assistants painted paper. He cut shapes and directed their arrangement. The shapes could move while he tested an idea. This gives us a way to discuss changing a method and revising a design.

What could Matisse change before the shapes were fixed?

How might moving a shape help an artist keep an idea going?

Alma Thomas The Eclipse 1970

Alma Thomas developed an abstract painting style using repeated coloured marks. Nature and space helped her find ideas. In The Eclipse, made in 1970, a dark blue centre sits within rings of colour. The centre is off to one side. This arrangement can suggest a moment of movement and change.

Which two details does the description give us?

How could repeating marks help us show a change?

A fact comes from the description. A personal reading starts with This suggests ... to me. Art can show change without telling us an artist's private feelings.
