Viewpoints about change and support

White standard edition

One big question

Does change make us stronger?

Stronger here can mean gaining a skill, confidence or a helpful way to cope. This can include asking for support.

An invented example

This example is about no real person.

A group changes the order of two familiar tasks. One person likes the new order. Another finds it hard to follow. A clear plan and time to practise may help. The group can explain what works and ask for changes.

Think about it

Could the same change affect people differently?
What support might help?

Viewpoints about change and support continued

White standard edition

Christianity

A religious worldview.

A possible viewpoint

Some Christians might say that change can help a person learn or grow, but it can also be painful or harmful. Many believe God cares during difficulty. Prayer, reflection, careful thinking and support from other people may help them cope. This does not mean every change was sent to teach a lesson, or that faith guarantees feeling stronger. A person may need time, rest, practical help or a safer situation.

Use the idea

How might this view answer our big question?
What reason could support that answer?

An original possible viewpoint, not a quotation from a real person. People within each worldview may think differently.

Viewpoints about change and support continued

White standard edition

Humanism

A non-religious worldview.

A possible viewpoint

Some humanists might say that the effects of change depend on what happens, the person and the support available. Change may offer a chance to learn, but it may also cause harm. Humanism uses human experience, evidence, reason and compassion without relying on gods. Reflection, practical help and community support may help a person cope. A person may need time, rest or a safer situation.

Use the idea

How might this view answer our big question?
What reason could support that answer?

An original possible viewpoint, not a quotation from a real person. People within each worldview may think differently.