Staff answers & diagnostic guide — Present and sequence the studio portfolio

Pathway: TRACK · Week 7 Part 1 · Big question: How do we select, sequence, and annotate our studio studies to tell a clear story of artistic growth?

Starter answer & explanation

Question: What turns a loose pile of drawings into a coherent, professional studio portfolio?

Correct: Logical sequencing, neat mounting margins, clear title labels, and honest reflective notes linking the pages — Exactly! Structure and short annotations guide the viewer through your creative decisions.

Guided team check (We do) answers

Q1: If a viewer looks at your Week 3 composition plan and your Week 4/5 final piece side by side, what should your annotation explain? -> How the plan guided the final piece and any deliberate adjustment you made in Week 5 to boost contrast (Yes! Explaining how the work evolved from plan to final piece shows real creative ownership.)

Q2: How do you keep multi-media pages (like chalk pastel or collage) tidy inside a portfolio folder? -> Place a clean barrier tissue sheet over dry pastel and check all collage corners are glued flat (Correct. Barrier sheets prevent pigment transfer onto neighbouring pages.)

Q3: What makes a strong 'Next studio Target' at the bottom of your portfolio review? -> A specific, testable technical goal (e.g. 'Develop five-tone ink wash gradation on larger A3 surfaces') (Spot on. A concrete studio target sets you up for immediate success in the next unit.)

Exit check answer

Question: Why do we sequence our early media tests and plans right before our finished identity artwork in the portfolio?

Correct: To show the complete visual journey and prove how deliberate testing and planning built the final piece — Correct. A sequenced portfolio tells the whole story of your artistic growth.
