Beliefs and care for the world reading cards

Christianity and stewardship

Many Christians believe God made the world. They may see its care as a duty. The word stewardship means taking care of something entrusted to us. A steward has a responsibility to look after it. For these Christians, care for creation may show love for God and for other people. They may choose to waste less, care for a growing space or help protect wildlife. Christians can choose different actions. No one action tells us everything about a person's belief.

Humanism and shared life

Humanism is a non-religious worldview. Humanists use reason, evidence and care for others when making choices. Many humanists care for the world because people and other animals depend on it. They may think about people who will live in the future too. Their reasons do not depend on belief in a god. A humanist and a Christian might both save water. They may share the action while giving different reasons for it. People within each worldview also differ.

An invented choice

In a made-up growing club, a tap keeps dripping. One group wants to put up a reminder to close taps. Another group wants to tell the adult who can arrange a repair. A reminder may help people remember. It will not mend a broken tap. Reporting the fault is a useful next step. The club can check whether the dripping stops. This gives them evidence about whether their action worked. Pupils should report a fault to an adult rather than try to repair it.

Reflecting on a reason

To reflect means to think carefully. First name the belief or value. Then explain a choice it could support. Ask who or what could benefit. Finally, think about a limit. A single action may help without solving every problem. We can describe a worldview fairly even when we do not share it. Learning about beliefs does not require us to agree, pray or share private experiences. In this lesson, discuss the invented club and the worldview cards.

Learn about these ideas without sharing your own belief. An adult can reread a short part.

Cards to discuss
