Enterprise: from garden to table.

A useful offer

Enterprise means organising an idea, resources and work to offer something useful. A customer is someone who might choose or pay for an offer. An idea needs checking; being useful does not guarantee a sale.

Product and service

A product is an item offered, such as a labelled starter-plant pot with a care card. A service is help offered, such as checking plant labels with adult supervision. Some offers combine an item and help.

A link from growing to use

Growing can lead to plants, produce or helpful services. A starter plant helps at the growing stage. A care service helps while a crop grows. Food use is a later conditional step that needs adult readiness, suitability and safety checks. Our close-grown pea trays remain observation plants, not food stock.

Invented examples only

A A starter plant offer

A labelled starter-plant pot with a care card could help a beginner understand how to care for a suitable plant. This is mainly a product: an item is offered.

B Plant care help

Supervised help checking labels and plant-care reminders could help someone caring for seedlings. This is a service: help is offered.

C A possible produce offer

A produce basket could be a later product idea only after adult checks of readiness, suitability and safe food use. It is an invented concept, with no harvest or sale today.

These are possibilities, not actual businesses, demand or fixed group choices.
