

Interests, values and working preferences

How can priorities guide exploration without deciding everything?

I can prioritise what matters to me in work and explain how this may affect the careers I explore.

Words that help

INTEREST

An activity or topic that holds attention or curiosity.

VALUE

Something that matters when considering work.

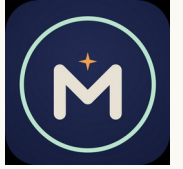

Start here

Interest: enjoys creating posters. Preference: likes a calmer setting.

Can a person value both variety and predictable hours?

Give a reason.

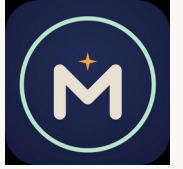

Rank, explain, revisit

Interests suggest tasks to explore; values help judge what matters.

Preferences can change with experience or circumstances.

Safety, dignity and fair treatment are not optional bargaining items.

What is the difference between a priority and a job requirement?

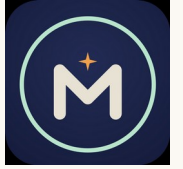

Maya's two fictional placements

Maya values creativity, clear plans and quieter work.

A: create display layouts; steady timetable; repeated design tasks.

B: plan events; more variety and people contact; schedule changes.

Which fits Maya's stated priorities better?

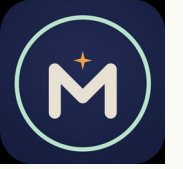

Compare the evidence

Maya also likes helping people, but it is not the top priority today.

B offers more direct group contact.

Neither card states pay, travel time or available adjustments.

What changes if variety becomes Maya's top priority?

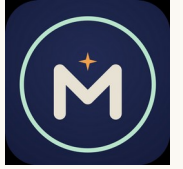

A fair trade-off?

A: less variety in exchange for a predictable pattern.

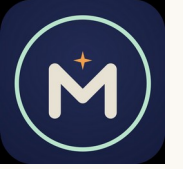

B: accepting humiliation to get a creative task.

Which is a preference trade-off?

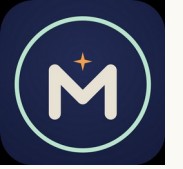

Your three tasks

1. Build a priorities profile: Use your own priorities or Maya's card. Rank five and explain the top two.
2. Compare options A and B: Use two criteria and identify one unknown.
- 3. Test a change of priority: Explain a possible preference trade-off and how new evidence could change the choice.

Use the worksheet and resource cards. Work one task at a time.

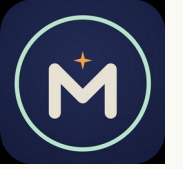

Check and improve

I can rank five current priorities and explain two.

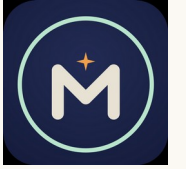

I can compare two fictional options using evidence.

I can identify a trade-off and an unknown without giving up fair treatment or safety.
