

Kindness, fairness and boundaries

Today: consider offers, choices and fair ways to respond to harm.

Use fictional examples. You do not need to carry out or report a kindness mission.

Can saying “no, thank you” fit a respectful exchange?

Words that help

KINDNESS

Considerate words or actions that respect another person.

BOUNDARY

A limit someone sets about what they want or accept.

The offer and the answer

Rae asks, “Would you like help carrying that folder?”

Mo says, “No, thanks. I have it.”

Rae replies, “Okay,” and leaves Mo space.

Where is the kindness in this exchange?

Kindness includes a choice

Ask before helping with someone's belongings or personal space.

A friendly offer does not create a debt. People can choose distance or no contact.

You can be respectful while protecting your own boundaries and asking for adult support.

Kindness includes a choice — continued

Must someone hug, forgive or stay friends to be kind?

Respectful, harmful or needs a check?

A: A pupil offers a spare pencil and waits for an answer.

B: A pupil posts a classmate's embarrassing photo without asking.

C: A pupil moves someone's work to "help", without checking.

Sort each action and improve the ones that need changing.

Prejudice and discrimination

Prejudice is an unfair judgement based on assumptions about a person's identity or group.

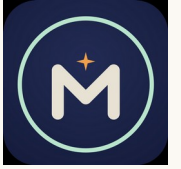

Discrimination is unfair treatment linked to who someone is or is assumed to be.

People deserve respectful treatment across differences in race, religion, disability, gender and other identities.

Prejudice and discrimination — continued

Which is an unfair judgement, and which is an action?

The design club

A member says that pupils with a disability cannot have good design ideas.

The member then refuses to include a pupil with a disability in the planning group.

The excluded pupil should not have to prove their worth to be included.

The design club — continued

Identify the unfair judgement and the unfair treatment.

We do: a safer response

Do not join in or spread harmful content. Move away if needed for safety.

Tell a trusted adult what happened. Ask the person privately what support they want, if it is safe to do so.

Adults should address the harm and the group's access arrangements.

We do: a safer response — continued

What can a bystander do without confronting the person causing harm?

Fairness may change the task

Everyone receives the same tiny-print instruction sheet. One pupil cannot read it.

The adult supplies larger print and reads the task aloud as an option.

The learning goal stays shared; the way to access it can differ.

Fairness may change the task — continued

Why can a different format be fair?

Your learning record

Task 1: sort offers and respect boundaries.

Task 2: distinguish a judgement from unfair treatment.

Task 3: improve a fictional group's response to exclusion.

Does your plan protect choice and include adult responsibility?

An invitation is not an obligation

Rae invites Mo to join a game. Mo says, “I would rather sit quietly.”

What is a respectful next response?